Nixon Faces Dilemma On Spending, Tax, Race Issues

By LUTI HARRIS

WASHINGTON-White House officials try to downplay a growing concern between the administration and the Congress over the next four years and their expected fight over fiscal policy, according to sources.

Nixon Administration officials, who have long been wary of the so-called "Kennedy touch" in Washington, are hoping for a "cooling-off" period in the administration's relationship with Congress.

In answer to a query about the future of the administration's relationship with Congress, an official said: "We are not worried about it. We are just looking for a way to work together." The official noted that the administration is working closely with Congress on various issues, including the budget, tax policy, and foreign affairs.
