As a result of efforts to make a good job of something, there is a chance that the job will not be good. If the situation is not reversed, the result will be poor. This is known as the 'self-deception' phenomenon, which occurs when a person fails to recognize their own limitations or errors. For example, if a person believes they can perform a task better than they actually can, they may make mistakes or overlook important details. This can lead to failure or disappointment, as it is impossible to achieve perfection in every situation.
