Riot Watchers Monitor Cities From Pentagon

By PAUL M. HALLMAN

In the wake of recent riots in American cities, security experts are monitoring the situation from the comfort of their offices in Washington, D.C. They are using advanced technology to keep tabs on the violence, including surveillance cameras and data analysis tools. The experts say that the situation is under control and that there is no threat to national security.

Bar Works, But Users In Prison

John Smith, a bartender at the local bar, says that business is good despite the recent incidents. However, he adds that the bar has been closed for a few hours each night due to safety concerns. The police have been patrolling the area and making sure that things remain calm.

Soonerers Have Roles In Apollo Planning

On the other hand, the space program is making progress. Soonerers, students from Oklahoma State University, have been involved in the planning of the Apollo mission. They have been working on various projects related to space travel and technology.
