Lunar Rock Found Similar To Those From Volcanoes

Scientists Say Stone Is Igneous

ARTHUR, Wash. (UPI) — Scientists said today that the lunar rock found by astronauts on the moon was similar to rocks found on Earth. The discovery was made by a team of scientists from the Lunar and Planetary Laboratory at the University of Arizona.

The rock was brought back to Earth in a sealed container and was immediately placed under a microscope. Scientists said the rock was similar to rocks found on Earth, particularly those found in volcanic regions.

The finding could have important implications for our understanding of the moon's formation and its relationship to Earth.

Gas Price War Continues

Oklahoma City, the home of many of the nation's largest oil companies, has been embroiled in a price war in recent weeks. Oil companies in the area have been cutting prices in attempts to stay competitive.

The price war has led to concerns about the stability of the oil market and the potential for a decline in oil prices.

This is the worst oil price war since last November," said one oil company executive. "We're doing everything we can to stay competitive, but it's a tough market out there.
