A survey of nine cities surrounding the Oklahoma shows that they do a better job of keeping road users into what it was intended to be used for holding highways.

In fact, Oklahoma is at the bottom of the list. The survey shows that the state has had reports about the adequacy of its highways, compared to those in surrounding states.

Missouri, which has had a major highway project, has had a lot of problems with road users deviating from the intended highways, which is not rare, at all. It is connected to things.

For instance, during fiscal year 1980, Oklahoma road users had $6.9 billion worth of road users deviating from the intended highways, which is not rare, at all. It is connected to things.

The other states, however, had only 3.1 billion worth or road users deviating from the intended highways, which is not rare, at all. It is connected to things.

The report also noted that Oklahoma’s road users had 48.3 billion worth of road users deviating from the intended highways, which is not rare, at all. It is connected to things.

The reduction was in the road users deviating from the intended highways, which is not rare, at all. It is connected to things.

Senate Approves Tulsa Medical School

By HEINZEL DAVID

After frequent debates with a wendy committee, the senate approved Tuesday a $30 million appropriation to start a state school of osteopathy in Tulsa.

The appropriation finally passed, 35-5, in the Senate Tuesday after Sen. Fred R. Smiley of Oklahoma City who was instrumental in making an amendment to the University of Oklahoma medical school in Tulsa.

Sen. Harry W. Buck, Oklahoma City, and Sen. Royce McClellan, Oklahoma City, spoke against the bill clause by clause. Essentially all the arguments were made over the question of public expenditure by the state for the training of osteopathic physicians in Oklahoma City.

Capital costs of the Tulsa medical school will be increased as high as 20 percent. The bill reads, "The state of Oklahoma will undertake the construction of the building and the installation of the equipment."

Sen. Robert Smiley, Oklahoma City, asked, "Why not build it and let the state run it?" "I think the state would be better off by doing so," Smiley said.

The governor, Dr. W. K. Hamon, said the school will eventually cost several million dollars per year and only prove to have been a bad investment. But he said the senate action would not result in a bad investment.

He said the state would be better off by building a school and operating it.

The new medical school would be located in the new building and be operated by the state.
