By JERRY LUCAS

What's being called the nation's first major environmental pollution problem is the subject of a newly appointed task force, an agency created by Congress last week to study the city's noise and its determination of how its noise problems are handled.

The task force, the National Environmental Pollution Committee, was established by the U.S. Congress in response to public concern about noise pollution. The panel, which will be composed of experts in the field of noise pollution, will be responsible for making recommendations to the Environmental Protection Agency on how to deal with the problem.

The panel's first meeting is scheduled for next month, and the panel's recommendations are expected to be completed by next year.
