also gives prompt, temporary relief in many cases from pain and itching in such tissues.

When, for instance, external hemorrhoids are present, there is pain and itching in the affected area. Also, a sensation of fullness and discomfort is experienced. These symptoms are not only distressing, but also cause embarrassment.

Such hemorrhoids can also be a result of a variety of conditions, including constipation, straining during bowel movements, and certain medical conditions such as pregnancy or cancer.

The treatment for external hemorrhoids involves good hygiene, warm soaks, and the use of over-the-counter treatments such as creams and lotions.

For internal hemorrhoids, the treatment usually involves dietary changes, such as increasing fiber intake, and the use of various medications.

In severe cases, surgery may be necessary to remove the hemorrhoids.

In addition to treatment, regular exercise, a healthy diet, and maintaining good bowel habits can help prevent hemorrhoids from occurring.
