MacDill-Air Force Base, a national focus of attention for admirers of the Thunderbirds, will be the site of a major test flight for a new aircraft designed to carry out in-flight refueling operations.

The aircraft, being developed by the Boeing Commercial Airplane Company, will be tested at MacDill to determine its performance in aerial refueling operations.

The test flight is scheduled for early next month, and will involve several aircrews from various units stationed at MacDill.

The aircraft is a four-engine jet with a high-mounted wing design, and is expected to be capable of carrying a cargo of up to 70,000 pounds.

The test flight will be conducted by a team of Boeing engineers and pilots, who will be working closely with the aircrews from MacDill to ensure safe and effective operation of the new aircraft.

The test flight is an important step in the development of the aircraft, and will help to determine its capabilities in real-world scenarios.

Super Guard '78
- Two belts • Two plies

Two new replacement belts are now available for use with the Thunderbird jet, which are designed to improve the aircraft's performance in aerial refueling operations.

The new belts are made of high-strength materials that can withstand the high temperatures and pressures encountered during aerial refueling.

They are also designed to be more durable and resistant to wear and tear, ensuring a longer lifespan for the aircraft.

The Thunderbird jets are equipped with two of these new belts, which are installed during routine maintenance checks.

These updates are expected to enhance the aircraft's ability to perform its mission, and will be part of a wider effort to improve the overall performance of the Thunderbird jets.
