Jury Convicts Dr. Jobe In Drug Case

By JESSE ROUSSEL

The American Medical Association, in a move that will affect many of its members, today announced that it has reached an agreement in principle on a settlement of a $5 million lawsuit filed by the U.S. Justice Department.

The settlement, which was disclosed to the public for the first time today, involves the American Medical Association's (AMA) attempt to block the publication of a book by Dr. John B. Jobe, a former AMA Board member and former president of the AMA.

The book, titled "Status of Drug Research in the United States," was written by Dr. Jobe, who was the AMA's chief lobbyist in the 1950s and 1960s. The book criticizes the AMA's policy of restricting the use of new drugs and technologies.

The AMA has been trying to get the book suppressed, saying it is false and defamatory. The settlement, which was reached after several months of negotiations, is expected to be announced officially next week.

The settlement agreement provides for the AMA to pay Dr. Jobe a substantial sum of money, and for the AMA to agree to drop its lawsuit. The AMA has also agreed to issue a statement expressing regret for any harm caused by the publication of the book.

The settlement is considered a major victory for Dr. Jobe, who has been fighting the AMA for years over its policies on drug research.
