Recruiting Wars Often Produce Strange Battles

Recruiting wars are good, maybe even healthy, if done properly. But today, the constant barrage of bikini-clad cheerleaders and the relentless stream of press conferences and satellite trucks across the nation is simply too much. The NCAA needs to regulate the madness, and it must start now.

The problem isn’t with the coaches themselves, but with the media and the fans. Coaches are just doing their job, trying to win games and build programs. But the media has turned it all into a circus, with endless hype and speculation.

The NCAA needs to take action to curb this madness. They should limit the number of recruits a coach can sign in a single season, and they should mandate that all recruiting must take place during a designated period. This would help prevent the constant stream of recruiting events.

Crispin Trapski, a defensive back for Oklahoma State University, said, "It’s just too much. We’re constantly being pursued by coaches and fans. It’s hard to focus on football when you have to deal with all this attention.

The NCAA also needs to address the issue of player welfare. With all the attention and pressure, players are starting to burn out. We need to protect their mental and physical health.

It’s time for a change. The NCAA needs to step in and regulate the recruiting process. Only then can we return to the good ol’ days of football and basketball.
