Murder Charge Denied

By Defiant Feminist

DALLAS (UPI) - Radical feminist Abigail Newbert was found guilty of first degree murder in the shooting of a Dallas police officer. The jury of six women found Ms. Newbert guilty on charges of murder and felony murder, and sentenced her to life in prison. Ms. Newbert had been charged with the shooting of officer Michael Thompson, who was killed while responding to a call.

She was convicted of stabbing the officer in the chest area, leading to his death. The trial lasted for two weeks, during which the defense team argued that Ms. Newbert was acting in self-defense.

The 25-year-old Newbert, a member of the radical group Black Liberation Front, was sentenced to life in prison. The judge, however, denied her request for parole, stating that she posed a danger to society.

Police Commissioner Richard White commended the jury for their decision, stating that justice had been served.

Newbert, who had previously been involved in various protests and demonstrations, had been charged with sexually assaulting a police officer in 1979. She was convicted of this charge and served a prison sentence.

In a statement following the trial, Newbert's attorney said that the verdict was unfair and that they would appeal the decision.
