City Hustles To End Garbage Foulups

BY TERRY MAISON

Although it's possible the towns have not followed their 62-mile trash route, the Oklahoma City council has decided to go it alone in the battle against illegal garbage dumping.

According to the city's public works department, the jokes stopped when the town hired a new waste management firm earlier this month.

The town has been dealing with the problem for years, but the council has yet to find a solution.

Over the years, the council has tried various methods, including hiring more workers and setting up more trash bins.

But the problem persists, and the council is looking for a permanent solution.

"The trash is a huge problem for us," said Councilman Tom Smith. "We've tried everything, but nothing seems to work."

The council is considering a variety of options, including a moratorium on new garbage collection in the affected areas.

"We need to give the citizens a break," said Councilwoman Jane Brown. "They're tired of living with this mess."
