Women 'Taped,' FAA Looks To Males

BY STEVE HUFFMAN

In the past month, Congress has held several hearings on the use of electronic surveillance by the Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) to monitor the activities of pilots and flight attendants. The hearings are part of a larger effort by the FAA to improve safety and security on American flights.

At a recent Senate hearing, FAA Administrator Gloriaa said that the agency is considering expanding its use of electronic surveillance to include more pilots and flight attendants. The FAA has already installed security cameras in airports, and is now looking at installing them in airplanes as well.

The hearings have been controversial, with some witnesses expressing concerns about the privacy implications of such surveillance. However, FAA officials have defended their actions, saying that the surveillance is necessary to ensure the safety of passengers and crew.

Detective Sheriff, Serious Case

In a surprising development, the agency has revealed that it is also monitoring the activities of pilots and flight attendants. This is in addition to the surveillance of airport workers that has been ongoing for some time.

The FAA has not provided any details about the number of pilots or flight attendants being monitored, or the specific activities that are being recorded. However, sources indicate that the surveillance is part of a broader effort to improve safety and security on American flights.

The FAA has been under pressure to improve its security measures in recent years, following several high-profile incidents. These include the 9/11 terrorist attacks, which killed nearly 3,000 people and caused widespread damage.

“Congress is concerned about the FAA’s ability to ensure the safety of passengers and crew,” said Senator Smith. “We will be looking closely at this issue, and will be holding further hearings if necessary.”

ALIOTO SETTLES FRISCO STRIKE

Mayor Defies Board

OF SAN FRANCISCO

BY ELEANOR ROSE

In a dramatic move, Mayor Alioto has announced that he will not support the Firemen's strike, which has been ongoing for several weeks. The strike has caused widespread disruption, with fire departments facing a shortage of personnel.

Mayor Alioto's decision has been met with mixed reactions. Some firefighters have praised his leadership, while others have criticized his decision as a betrayal of the firefighters.

The strike has been called by the Frisco Firemen's Union, which is demanding a new contract that includes higher pay and better working conditions. The union has been in negotiations with the city for several months, but has been unable to reach an agreement.

Mayor Alioto's decision to oppose the strike has been praised by some, who see it as a necessary step to protect public safety. Others, however, have criticized his decision, saying that it is a violation of the union's rights.

The strike has been ongoing for several weeks, and has caused widespread disruption. Many residents have reported delays in their fire inspections, and some have expressed concern about the city's ability to respond to emergencies.
