Ford Told Export To U.S. Will End

The Washington Post News Service LINDY NESS, Jr., Paris — President Ford, facing the Western Hemisphere and the emerging importance of the U.S. as a world market, is being urged by Ford officials to reconsider his decision to end U.S. exports of passenger cars.

The President's decision, announced last week, has already have repercussions throughout the automobile industry, with dealers, manufacturers and workers fearing a loss of jobs and a decline in production. Ford, the largest U.S. automaker, employs about 200,000 people and is a key player in the U.S. economy.

The New York Times reported that Ford officials were considering ways to reverse the decision, possibly by offering incentives to foreign buyers or by increasing production in the U.S.

The decision was based on Ford's assessment that the U.S. market was saturated and that exporting would not be profitable. However, Ford's蚬.

The decision was based on Ford's assessment that the U.S. market was saturated and that exporting would not be profitable. However, Ford's executives have acknowledged that the decision was made in the context of a larger strategy to reduce costs and improve competitiveness.

The move has been met with mixed reactions. Some analysts认为 that Ford's decision shows a lack of long-term thinking and could hurt the company's reputation. Others believe that the decision is necessary to ensure the company's survival in a highly competitive market.

The decision has also raised questions about the future of the U.S. auto industry. Ford is not the only automaker to consider reducing production or exporting to foreign markets. Other U.S. companies, such as General Motors and Chrysler, have also faced similar challenges.

In response, the President has indicated that he will consider all options, including austerity measures and increased exports, to ensure the long-term health of the U.S. economy.

Gerry Bridgen and Bill Pratt refer to themselves as"everyone that has ever walked in this room" as they were having a great time at the Oklahoma City's Full Line, Full Time Camera Shop.

The Bridgen/Pratt show is just one of the many that have been added to the store's lineup of events. The store has a wide variety of events, from cooking classes to wine tastings, and even a weekly trivia night.
