Mercury Ties Summer High

August left with a slight blinding as Oklahoma City broke 100 degrees for the first time since June 15. The city was hit with a heat wave that caused widespread power outages and left many without electricity for days. The National Weather Service reported that temperatures reached 106 degrees in Oklahoma City on August 27, breaking the previous record for the date. The heat wave was caused by a high-pressure system that remained over the state for several days, leading to extreme temperatures and a high chance of wildfires. The city's water supply was stretched to its limits, causing many residents to conserve water and use fans and air conditioners sparingly. The situation was exacerbated by the heat, as the city's water treatment plants struggled to keep up with demand. The high temperatures also caused delays in transportation and construction projects, as work had to be halted due to the heat. The heat wave was finally broken by a cold front that moved through the region, bringing some relief to Oklahoma City.
