Wildlife Reform Urged By Panel

By JUNE GILLIES

The Oklahoma Wildlife Department, which administers the state's fish and wildlife programs, has recently been criticized for its management practices. A panel of experts has recommended several changes to improve wildlife conservation and management in Oklahoma. The panel's report includes recommendations for habitat restoration, species management, and funding increases. The Oklahoma Wildlife Department has pledged to consider the panel's recommendations and to prioritize actions that can be implemented immediately. The report was presented to the Oklahoma legislature, and legislators are expected to review it carefully.
