The resolution, sponsored by several lawmakers, was introduced last week.

The election is being held to fill a vacancy created by the death of former Gov. Harry Hughes in May.

Washington, D.C. - In a surprising and controversial decision, government scientist Dr. John Smith has claimed that heart pumps pose a danger to public health. The expert's findings, which were presented at a recent conference, have raised eyebrows among medical professionals.

The government scientist's claim, which would have profound implications for medical research and practice, has sparked a debate among experts. Some have called for further study, while others have condemned the scientist for his over-the-top rhetoric.

In an interview with the Oklahoma Journal, Dr. Smith explained his reasoning. "We've known for some time that heart pumps can cause complications, but we never realized the extent to which they could pose a threat," he said. "Our research has shown that these devices can cause serious and even life-threatening conditions."
New York Could Learn Something

Women Know How To Pinch Pennies

Women often curse their bills, but they have never done it with such skill as a group of New York women who are saving every penny they can. They are members of the Women's Budget Club. They meet every week to discuss ways to save money, and they have developed some ingenious methods. One of the group's most popular tricks is the "pinch penny." They use this technique when they have to pay a bill that they cannot afford, and they will actually pinch the penny to make it smaller so that they can stretch it out over a longer period of time. Another method is to use coupons and discounts to reduce their expenses. They also try to shop around for the best deals and avoid impulse purchases. These women are teaching their fellow New Yorkers some valuable lessons about how to save money.
