Hoover's Files 'Bucket Of Worms'

WASHINGTON — J. Edgar Hoover's personal files were handed over on Wednesday for the first time in more than 30 years, according to officials, after a last-minute request by the FBI director.

William J. Fallon, FBI assistant director, said in a message to Hoover's former chief of staff, that Hoover was told he could deposit his personal files at FBI headquarters in Washington, D.C., but would have no official status with the FBI.

"The FBI has made the files available to the public," Fallon said in a statement. "The files contain a significant amount of personal information on Hoover that would be of interest to a variety of researchers." Fallons request came after Hoover's family members, including his daughter and son, were granted access to his personal files.

Fallon said he had met with Hoover's family members to discuss the files and the FBI's decision to make them available.

"We will continue to work with Hoover's family to ensure that the files are handled appropriately and that they are made available to the public," Fallon said.

Fallon said that the files would be made available to researchers and the public on a selective basis, and that the FBI would be responsible for ensuring that the files are properly handled.

"We are committed to ensuring that these files are made available to the public in a way that respects the privacy of the individuals involved," Fallon said.

The FBI's decision to make Hoover's files available to the public is a significant step forward in the agency's efforts to make its records more transparent and accessible to the public.
