Dying Of A Broken Heart...

Loneliness Can Lead To Early Deaths?

by Elaine Goll, CQ-DU, Southwestern Times-Transcript

IS IT POSSIBLE it is of a broken heart, not the disease, that one dies? Yes, it is, as the findings of a study at the Southwestern University Medical School show.

The study, one of the most comprehensive ever conducted, was made at the University of Arizona Medical School. It revealed that those who were lonely and isolated were more likely to die of heart disease than those who had close and loving relationships.

The research, which was conducted over a period of five years, involved thousands of people. The results showed that those who lived alone or who had few close friends were much more likely to die of heart disease than those who lived with others or who had many close friends.

The study also found that those who were lonely and isolated were more likely to develop heart disease in the first place. This is because loneliness and isolation can lead to stress, which is known to be a major risk factor for heart disease.

Dr. Robert Johnson, one of the lead researchers on the study, said, "We found that those who were lonely and isolated were much more likely to develop heart disease than those who had close and loving relationships. This is because loneliness and isolation can lead to stress, which is known to be a major risk factor for heart disease."

Plight Of The Workers

New York City - I report.

The workers' strike has entered its third week, and the mood is anything but optimistic. The workers, who have been without pay for 10 days, are still determined to win their demand for higher wages.

The company, which produces high-quality industrial equipment, has refused to budge on the wage issue. The workers, who have been involved in a long-term dispute with the company, are convinced that the strike is their last chance to improve their working conditions.

The strike has caused a significant slowdown in production, and the company is losing a large amount of money. The workers are determined to continue the strike until their demands are met.

Are we going to go back to our guns?

World events seem to be pointing in this direction. The United States and its allies are preparing for a possible military intervention in the Middle East. The United States is also increasing its military spending, which has already reached record levels.
