The 'Fugitive' Is Dead

SANTA MONICA, CA (AP) - David Janssen, the actor who brought the quirky but lovable character of Sam Drislane to television in the popular series "The Fugitive," died Thursday at his home in Santa Monica, Calif. He was 65.

Janssen, who came to fame in the late 1950s as Dr. David Summer on the television series "The Fugitive," was battling cancer when he died. He was married to actress Joanne Woodward, with whom he had two children.

Janssen, who had been diagnosed with cancer in 1992, had been treated for the disease at the University of California Los Angeles Cancer Center for the past two years.

In-the-Dash Driver

Ever wonder what happens when cars break down on a two-lane highway with only about 40 miles between San Francisco and Los Angeles? A little-known phenomenon: in-the-dash drivers. This allows drivers to use their dashboard to display public service messages. The practice has been around for years, but it's only recently gained widespread attention. These drivers are often known to display messages such as "Keep Calm and Carry On." In some cases, they even use the dashboard to display humorous messages, such as "I'm so broke I can only afford to drive on weekends." This practice has become so popular that some drivers now have special dashboard lights and electronic displays to show off their messages. The practice is becoming so popular that some cities are starting to regulate it, but for now, it remains a popular form of in-the-dash communication.
