Reagan still considering second spot

By Clare F. Richards

HP National Writer

On the eve of the third Republican National Convention, President Reagan released an address proposing the creation of a national convention on crime and violence — a move that could result in a second spot for him in the upcoming elections.

Reagan’s address was written in response to the recent crime wave in the United States. He said that he believes the country — and the country’s leaders — must do something to stop the violence.

The conservative jump was hailed by many as a sign that Reagan is serious about crime control.

The White House said that the president’s new initiative is aimed at bringing law enforcement and civil society together to tackle the problem of crime.

Reagan said that the country needs a national convention on crime and violence. He also said that he would work with other leaders to make sure that the convention is a success.

The White House said that Reagan’s initiative is in line with the president’s campaign promise to make crime a priority.

Reagan said that he is confident that the country will be able to solve the problem of crime, but he added that it will take time and effort.

"We have a long way to go," Reagan said. "But I am confident that we will get there in the end."
